For some time now, I've had these three items, but I can't recall where they came from or how I got them. They came to me one inside the other inside the other: in other words, the fishing line was inside the decorative envelope, which was inside the mailing envelope. But how can that be, you say. The decorative envelope is slightly larger (taller) than the mailer. See the horizontal bend about a quarter inch from the top? It had been folded to fit the decorative envelope. A similar vertical fold can be made out along the right-hand side. But why? Why bother?

Take another look at the mailer. See the symmetrical floral bric-a-brac on either side and behind. Note the international award won at an international exhibition. And look at the banner ribbon at the bottom, asserting 'Flyes Dressed to any Pattern', and the garland at right enclosing the date and place of the Exhibition.

Why did Mr. Anderson go to the trouble of arranging for a striking impression? For marketing purposes and a bit more security for the package.

There's much more to be looked into: The Latin motto (for the sake of honour), the route of arrival in Ottawa (via Derry in N. Ireland from Dunkeld near Edinburg), the red wax seal (on back), the embossed corner cachet, the attached stamp (with clear CDS), the post office cancel(118), AND a whole related back story about the merchant, Roderick Anderson, whose descendants branched off into making manga wood golf clubs alongside the rods and reels.
